The ADVERTISING STAFF

Man is going to have to learn to live comfortably and effectively no matter how quickly changes take place in his immediate surroundings. That means that we are probably going to have to be very much more careful than we have ever been in the past, not to give our small children absolute rules in childhood which may not be applicable when they are grown up. It may be that their world will be very different indeed from the world we can see now, and it may not be at all useful to them, and to the world in which they live, if we impose limiting loyalties on them, if we give them the idea, for instance, that they should concern themselves only with local welfare, or that their concern should stop at national boundaries. It is quite clear, surely, that we are now moving very rapidly toward a world community where loyalty to any group less than the whole human race, and on any scale smaller than this little earth, will not be of service to the human race and, therefore, will not be of service to the individual either. Because that is true we are going to have to help our children to develop way beyond our capacity; and that means primarily liberating them from very many of the "certainties" the "local loyalties", the "absolute convictions"—the sorts of things to which almost all of us were exposed in our childhood. We must leave them free to develop way beyond our capacity so that they can cope with the things that we are not quite developed enough, not quite mature enough, not quite able enough to act as world citizens to cope with effectively.
